Synopsis

Still on a high from their honeymoon in the Caribbean, Andrew and Kate are a newly wed couple living the high life in their new neighborhood. Just when they think life couldn't get any better, Kate's deadbeat father, Artie (Nicholson), becomes an unexpected, and soon to find out, permanent guest. Laid off due to an agricultural decline, Artie is an unemployed farmer in a progressive city, leaving him with little skills relevant to 2016.

Sympathizing for her father, Kate convinces Andrew to give Artie a temp job at his company App Creation, to get him on his feet and more importantly, off of their couch. Andrew, never having gotten along much with Artie, reluctantly agrees to help his father-in-law. Artie goes to work each day, filing papers, making calls, doing the normal, mundane things no one else wants to do. Sitting outside of Andrew's office each day, Artie picks up on the lingo of the business world and does some behind-the-scenes creating of his own.

Having worked on his own app for weeks with no one knowing, Artie calls a board meeting and pitches his idea to the company. He ends up blowing them away with his idea and they go into the creative process of making it a reality. Andrew, at first hesitant to admit Artie's success, congratulates him at the creation of his new and very successful app, Words with Friends. After a change in heart and realization of his talent, Andrew makes Artie the Editor in Chief of the company. This showed Kate and Andrew that through their support and patience, the faith they had in him was never misplaced. This rebuilds their relationship and Artie finally moves out of the house, only to buy the one next door.
